Go to the main content of the University of Wisconsin-Madison One of your main goals as a writer is to present the ideas in a clear and understandable way. To help readers move through your complex ideas, you want to be deliberate about how you structure your paper as a whole, as well as how you form the individual items that make up it. In order to ponder the challenges of presenting your ideas clearly, logically, and in a way that seems natural to your readers, check out some of these resources: Develop a dissertation statement, paragraph, and develop strategic transitions: Writing that establishes relationships and connections between ideas. While clear writing is mostly achieved through the deliberate sequence of your ideas throughout your work, you can guide readers through the connections you make through transitional words in individual sentences. Transitional words and phrases can create a powerful connection between your ideas and can help your reader understand the logic of your work. Below we've included a list of commonly used transient words and phrases that can help you establish how your different ideas relate to each other. We have divided these words and phrases into categories based on the common types of relationships that writers establish between ideas. Two recommendations: Use these transitions strategically, making sure that the word or phrase you choose is consistent with the logic of the relationship you are emphasizing, or the connection you are making. All of these words and phrases have different meanings, nuances and connotations, so before you use a certain transitional word in your work, make sure you understand its meaning and use completely, and make sure it's the right match for the logic of your paper. Use these transient words and phrases sparingly because if you use too many of them, your readers may feel like you have overly inexplicable connections that are already clear.
