After years of success on Wall Street, Jim Kramer decided to share his knowledge of investing with the public in a book called Jim Kramer's Real Money: Sane Investing in a Mad World. The book aims to give the average investor a better understanding of how to choose individual shares. In 2005, Kramer took his message to the masses with a television show called Mad Money. The colorful show currently airs weekdays on CNBC and has developed a frenzied following of fans and critics. The program is designed to dive into the world of investing every day with Kramer giving his opinion on which stocks a person should buy or sell. As a co-owner and writer for TheStreet.com, Kramer has been posting stock market comments for over a decade. In 2001, Action Alerts PLUS was established as a TheStreet.com service so that investors can trade with Kramer when he makes investment decisions for his charitable foundation portfolio. How does Action Alerts PLUS work? Action Alerts PLUS is a subscription service offered through TheStreet.com. The service alerts you by email and through the website when Kramer recommended that the stock be bought or sold. Kramer gives very detailed information about the stocks, the actions he will take, and perhaps most importantly, why he makes that decision. At the end of each week he does a weekly review of all the shares he currently owns in the charitable foundation. The weekly review looks at each position and discusses what is likely to affect the price of each stock in the coming week. What are the benefits of using Action Alerts PLUS? With this service you will be able to get inside the head of an industry expert and learn from your experience. Kramer shares with you every step he is going to take in a charitable foundation before he takes action. You will get full access to each holding and understand why it wants to buy or sell each share. Action Alerts PLUS will provide you with the tools you need to make an informed decision. So even if you don't want to repeat Kramer's trades (or perhaps you don't even want to trade at all), you can still use this service to learn how investing works and how one of the leading investors makes it a trading decision. A service like that with a personal mentor that can guide you into turning the scary world of investing into something that we can all understand and cope with. Another neat thing about the service is that it not only gives you stock tips, but also provides you with the insight and tools you need to potentially make your own independent trading decisions in the future. For those who are new to investing, Action Alerts PLUS is a great option because you learn from some of the best and brightest and access to reliable research and advice. The website has a huge amount of information available to subscribers, including articles such as Kramer Twenty-Five Rules for Investing and the Ten Commandments for Trading. There is a section that will guide you on how best to use Kramer's website and tips. Below is a preview of some of Jim's latest positions. You will be able to see the entire portfolio, as well as open and closed positions inside. Who should use Action Alerts PLUS? Anyone who is interested in active stock trading or who just wants to understand how it works with the help of an expert opinion, can benefit from Action Alerts PLUS. There are many useful tools and an abundance of educational information. Alert actions can also really help shave off a lot of the time that is usually spent on research. Even as an experienced investor, I found the website and alerts extremely useful for stock valuation. The service is moving at a comfortable pace and for those who are new in the investing world, I think it is comfortable enough that you can get quite comfortable with it. The free 14-day trial of Action Alerts PLUS is available to check the service and see if it's right for you. Click here to register today. If you end up enjoying the service and want to stay, you can subscribe to an annual subscription where you get $25 off through this promotion, as well as a free copy of Jim's new book, Back to the Moat. What If? What if we have a vaccine. The one that works. The one that stops Covid-19, who sprays it, clobbers him and teaches him the lesson of his life. Don't spill on me! Yes, this is what today's rally was about, a virtual dry run for the potential vaccine success that Moderna (MRNA) may be able to produce en masse by the end of the year. Who can blame unbridled enthusiastic buyers. Moderna, a revolutionary new drug company that uses artificial intelligence and Amazon's (AMN) Web Services to speed up the vaccine for what might otherwise take years to develop, goes into phase two trials for its vaccine. More importantly, it's already shooting for late-stage trials in early summer. It's really warp speed fast and you can believe if it works and we don't see any serious side effects in the first three or four months of phase three, we'll line up for the anti-Covid-19 force field. Today's rally is what it will look like. It's a dry run for a big win and it's powerful, all embracing and evidence of what you had to buy rather than sell at the heart of the pandemic. What you should ignore tomorrow's disgusting labor department payroll number is because it's a rearview mirror because the bottom of the U.S. economy has been introduced and the good news is around the bend. Now that you've heard Pangloss's vision of the endless rally that we've had, the one that brought the Nasdaq all the way back to even, let me give you a more plausible explanation of the action. First, it is possible, given that we reopen that April marked the bottom in many different industries, from toys, pickup waste to even aerospace. This is what is a very tough CEO of Raytheon Technology Technologies told us this morning at Squawk on the street. Admittedly, this is based on the fact that it couldn't be worse than April, given that hardly anyone has bothered to fly at all, something that isn't all that positive for the huge portion of passenger planes that Raytheon does, including most engines. Secondly, we get some normal life. As limited as it is, there are restaurants that are open, admittedly with low smaller tables, maybe too little to survive, but who knows that the government gives you eight weeks of salary money and expenses if your small restaurant stays in business. Shouldn't you try? We know that Wynn (WYNN), a giant casino operator, has a very thoughtful plan to open its casinos, with the support of experts from Georgetown and Johns Hopkins. They don't fool around. Think of me as a believer. On Thursday morning I received an email entitled This is Right-Sport back. There's a big UFC 249 fight on May 9 between the two undoubtedly fantastic contestants, and it's on display this Saturday in front of a fanless audience. It seems at least some pro-sports impresario have figured out how to do sports. Can basketball, baseball or football be far behind? Maybe someone has figured out how to do professional sports for real. Is that why Disney 'DIS' stock is going up rather than down after this suboptimal quarter? Third, we know that the resumption of America is fraught with the possibility of a new eruption in the Covid-19 deaths, but perhaps just maybe the outbreak may not happen. The president, hating him or like him, said it was worth the risk to open up rather than have the Great Depression. This may well mean that the bottom has been entered. This time we at least know the drill. Fourth, oil, which collapsed to minus $37 a barrel, rose steadily by the mid-twenties. I know it's far from the thirties that would take the many bankruptcies we expected off the table. Remember that for many hedge funds, oil is a barometer of activity, and this really is a sign of the success of rediscovery. This is huge, given how the decline seemed catastrophic. Fifth, we don't have a vaccine yet, but we have the prospect of a shorter stay in a deadly hospital, due to Gilead's early success remdesivir (GILD). Earlier this week, Regeneron (REGN) announced that it is painfully close to creating monoclonal antibodies that can help fight the disease once you catch it. Maybe their drug can work side by side with remdesivir to create a powerful cocktail-like potion that has transformed AIDS from a death sentence into a manageable disease. Sixth, we have companies that thrive in new words, companies such as ServiceNow (NOW) and Salesforce.com (CRM) that have come up with how to resume thoughtfully and productively. This is why their stocks have been on fire lately and may not be able to be stopped even on the worst days. absolutely incredible including today's launch in the cloud messenger Twilio Twilio. Finally, there is some economic activity out there for sure. We see home Depot (HD) stocks rallying in a few days and days. Shares of Stanley Black and Decker (SWK) are flying. Maybe maybe even the gardening season, often thinking about Christmas for the chain? Housebuilders seem to have hit a kind of bottom. It's a big economy bullet right here. I don't know if it's all just a bunch of malarkey. It is possible that the Moderna vaccine does not work. It's too new a way to fight the new coronavirus. Maybe it's not effective in a few weeks. Maybe it makes some people sick. There is a reason why vaccine development can take years. Much more can go wrong than right when you inject a healthy person with a form of poison. Opening a country may be premature. Successful discoveries of other countries have more tests and more contact tracking. You know who has it that will help you not get it. Masks that seem so abhorrent to many in this country, including the president, are a standard issue. Some states are still on a tilt when it comes to infections, hospitalizations and deaths. It doesn't seem recommended, while a pandemic rages to throw more people into the state of hell. And the joy of the market may be more of a function of a lack of investment alternatives, or the desire of money managers to keep up with the average or the flow of money that went to the growth managers who won during the April romp, the best in decades. Me? I want to stick to the mantra about owning stocks that thrive in a recession, but can also do well if, indeed, we claw out of the abyss. I don't want airline shares, although it would be a miracle if the oracle of Omaha would market lower with the sale of 10% of the big four airlines. I don't want to mess with companies that have defied balance sheets where dividends are at risk, a lone copy of Walt Disney's company, because of its iconic brand. You still can't get me to recommend hotel shares or banks. But I get a rally. It's based on hope, and this time hope doesn't hang on breaking the branch. It hangs on a that can hold, and even if it is not, it is no longer a death sentence for many who fall to the ground. (Amazon, Salesforce and Disney are holding in Jim Kramer's Action Alert PLUS Club member. Now.)
